PERSONAL AND SOCIETY.

The Lull in Midsummer. For the past few days the only relief one could have from the weather was in telling your neighbor how warm it was "up to our house," and the one whose thermometer registered the highest was the most contented. Hundreds have left the city in hopes of finding some more endurable clime, and hundreds more are making preparations to get away. Society has reached its midsummer standstill and an account of the society people's doings is simply told in two words-"has gone" or "is going." The national holiday was chosen for family picnics, not large affairs at all, but attendance included only relatives, while the evening, as every one knows, was given up to the pyrotechnical displays, some of those up town even rivaling those shown at the court-house. Lawn socials have settled down to a mere sit-around-and-talk and the serving of the coolest and lightest refreshments. The devoted slaves of base-ball and tennis are the only ones who do not let the heat interfere with their pleasure. The young people arise at 4, 5 or 6 o'clock in the morning and play tennis till 8 or 9, and do not seem to mind the violent exercise. The attendants at base-ball have only to go to the grounds and the exercise is performed by others. Of the two enthusiasts the base-ballists have the most comfortable time.

One of our most delightful hostesses is given to spells of absent-mindedness, and in the famfly the little failing is sometimes the subject of considerable amusement. One day last week she invited some friends to dinner. At the appointed time they went to her house, but found no hostess. One, braver than the rest, consulted the cook, who said that no order had been given for dinner, and the maid did not know where her mistress had gone. The to-be guests waited for an hour after the appointed time and the men became very impatient at the delay. So they concluded that as there was no hostess and no dinner they would depart. The men went down town to a restaurant and the women went home to lunch on whatever cold victuals there might be in the house. When the hostess arrived home and was told of the company having been there she immediately rushed around and ex-plained that she had asked them for the succeeding day, but as they all went at the same time they are inclined to believe it was simply a clever ruse to cover up her forgetfulness.

One woman here who had planned a summer tour was prevented from going by sickness in the family. She determined not to be cheated out of it entirely, and has settled upon a novel journey. She first stopped all the clacks in the house, so she would not be bothered by hours. When she feels like it, she gets up in the morning, eats when she is hungry, reads when so disposed, goes to sleep whenever she feels inclined. If she wants to go down town she takes no note of time, if the car is in sight before she gets to the corner she does not make any demonstration to attract the notice of driver or conductor, but waits for the next; if she wishes particularly to feel that she is out of town she goes into the does not see any of her friends except as she casually meets them on the street, but rejoices to interview a canvasser or agent whom she does not know, and her purchases down town are made in stores where she has never been before, for all of this makes her feel as if she was "out of town" for the summer. She is an artist and a genius, and likes to do odd things, and for the past week has been indulging the vacation fancy. She enjoys the comforts of home and the charm of novelty, and avoids crowded hotels, railroads and the expense.
